Why the seat selection changed

When customers called into the box office, the customers who didn't express any concern about the pricing often knew which section of the theater they'd like to sit in. The customers that didn't know which section they'd want to sit in felt better when we put them in seats that had the best available view (closest to center). A few called about the cheapest seats available, so some are price sensitive.

Because of these findings, I wanted the user to be able to select which section of the theater to sit in first. I provided descriptions for each section to accommodate for the users who would not know which section they'd want to sit in, and I incorporated price information for those who are price sensitive.

Also, the seat selection interface is often frustrating and clunky to do on the phone (e.g. airline tickets).
